••••••••••• SHORT STORY

OF THE DAY. LITTLE ITALY'S TRAGEDY.

From the Atlanta Constitution. From the vine-clad slopes of sunny Italy came Philip Acunda. To him the New World held out an inviting hand, and fortune seemed just about to smile on him. So, leaving his young wife in tears and taking his little son by the hand, he bravely walked aboard the ship that was to bear him away to the realization of his Greams.

Surely failure could not be his. The thoughts of his little wife so far away, impatiently waiting his return, praying for his success, made stout his heart, and he worked as he had never worked before.

He had at once settled in New York, for certainly in such a large city there must be abundance of work, and he vowed to himself that nothing should stand in the way of his success.

himself that nothing should stand in the way of his success.

Time dragged by and Philip labored from early dawn to nightfall, and the little savings in the bank increased slowly but stendily, and at last came the day when he should send for the little wife, his Vincenza, to come and take charge of the nest he had provided. And they should never be parted again—this he swore.

The little home at 224 East One Hundred and Ninth street was a model in its way, and the neighbors all agreed that it way, and the neighbors all agreed that it was the nicest of any in the block. So Philip was pleased with himself and the world, and most of all was he pleased because Vincenza was expected to arrive on the following dev cause Vincenza was expected to arrive on the following day. He and the son were the first at the dock to await the coming of the ship. What a meeting! Philip, happy fellow, shed tears of joy and the little son danced shed tears of joy and the little son danced about in an ecstacy of delight.

Then, after a thousand questions had been asked—and answered—Mistress Acunda introduced to her husband a fellow passenger, Luigi Pozzo, of Naples.

Of course Luigi was warmly received as a friend of the wife, and being a stranger to the country, why should not be come to the country.

to the country, why should not he come and make his home with them? Surely there was room for another, and it would he so pleasant to have with them one who was so lately from the old country—and a friend of the wife. friend of the wife.

So Luigi and his little red box became members of the Acunda household, and Little Italy rejoiced in another inhabitant, Needless to say, Luigi looked for workbut vainty, and he would come home early, disheartened, and Mistress Vincenza was disheartened, and Mistress Vincenza was so sympathetic.

Then as time passed, the tongues in Little that began to wag and some said Philip must be blind, that he could not see what lovemaking was going on right under his nose. But he was evidently blind, for he came and went as usual with no word of reproach.

Six months went by and the tongues had of ceased, when one day Philip came ome earlier than was his custom and as a strode into the little sitting room, there sat Luigi with his arms about Vinceneza's waist and her head upon his shoulder. Philip was a quiet man who avoided difficulties at all times, but at the sight of cifficulties at all times, but at the sight of his wife in the other man's arms his blood fairly bolled within him and—well. Luigi was thrown out bag and baggage and took up his abode across the street. Philip was hardly out of sight and hearing next morning when Luigi crossed over and entered his former lodging place. This same thing took place day after day, and again the tongues in Little Italy wagged to their utmost. Rumor had it that Luigi had given up his search for work and spent all his time his search for work and spent all his time with Vincenza when her husband was away.

And again did Philip appear blind. He And again did Philip appear blind. He appeared to take no notice.

Then came the news that Luig! was about to return to Naples to his wife and children. This was the first that Little Italy knew of a wife and child beyond the sea, and talk and surmise was rife.

There was talk, too, of an inheritance, and already Luigi had bought his ticket, strapped the little red box and was only waiting the departure of the ship.

He had told many of his friends and acquaintances farewell, but not a word did he utter to Vinceuza.

She had heard the talk, had seen how happy and light-hearted he appeared and she went about her work with a strange drawn face.

She could not sleep at night. Luigt had drawn face.

She could not sleep at night. Luigi had

She could not sleep at night. Luigi had She could not sleep at night. Luigi had deceived her: he loved her no longer and was, no doubt, glad to leave her. These and many other thoughts surged through her brain as she lay awake.

At last came Friday night and Luigi was the sell on the morrow.

He sought his bed early There were two other beds in the room, his own between them. The other occupants came in. The room was small end hot, and they left the door

It was the first hour of the morning. The silence was only broken by the breathing of the three sleepers.

There was a light step on the stairs; a form filled the doorway. It was that of a woman. Noiselessly she crossed the floor and bent over the first bed. Then she straightened up and drew from her bosom something that flashed in the starlight. She turned to the next bed. As she leaned over the sleeper moved restlessly—it was Luigi.

He was probably dreaming of his beit was Luigt.

He was probably dreaming of his beloved Naples, of his home and of his boyhood, for a smile flitted across his face.

An arm rose and fell.

Luigi leaped from the bed with a yell of fear. He grappled with his assallant and fighting they rolled about the floor.

The other sleepers awoke and sought to the Priests' ball who will apply to HIM safety in the darkness. safety in the darkness.

Wrenching her hand free, the woman buried the weapon in his back—then she fied.

"Vincenza, Vincenza! She has killed me!"
he screamed and fell to the floor, the blood gushing from a foot long cut in his back.
The whole house was astir. The lodgers crowded the room. They saw and under-Vincenza had disappeared, none knew where none cared.

Death comes early to faithless lovers in Little Italy, and when the bleeding body is brought forth these children of vengeance only shrug their shoulders, smile a significant smile and pass on.

People are considering what they are go-ing to do about a home. The Journal Real Estate columns will help.
